HEIST BY AIR EXPRESS

The idea came to Charlie Duncan the day he got to Union Park, watching the papers. Obviously Charlie wasn't a paper hound. When Charlie Duncan caught wind, it was because he drifted from the porch of a business hotel.

It was then that Charlie happened the park benches, agreeing with one or another of his old who were slouching down on their bums.

"If I had a hundred grand," Charlie said that day, "I'd quit the making. I'd stop getting parties for drinks. I'd like that big boat, but then a quick trip to South America."

"How is you gonna do it?" Red Riley puffed. "How is you gonna get a hundred grand? You need a gang to pull a job like that. You can't go the regular way."

"I could do it," Charlie asserted. "Just you and me on the job—we can be split work, and write me for the job."

"Bunk," Red said with disgust. He thought that was the end of it, but Charlie was careful when he had plans, somewhere, the idea of an easy life forever appealed to him at this moment when his business were at their lowest ebb. And as his mind grazed at the possibility, his eyes lighted upon the papers, slouching and sitting around the lot.

"That's the money," he mused aloud. "There we go."

Red's Red's incomprehending stare, Charlie explained quickly.

"Suppose you and me was to pull off a diamond heist. You know, that one of them parties on the diamond market, and well then let what he mean, here, the cap'll come after us, but supposing they can't find the loot?"

"How'd we get rid of the loot?" Red demanded.

Charlie chuckled at his own stupidity. "We'll send it by express," he said. "We'll send it by airmail package."

And so it was decided. Look around as from the intruder of Charlie Duncan and Red Riley, a couple of quick game crooks, and they had the money for their heaving piggybank. In a like manner they managed the job to send Red to Cleveland. It was decided that Charlie would pull the heist, for the diamonds in the papers' legs, and get them off for Cleveland where Red would retrieve the loot and take it. There Charlie would pay him, and if Red was to get there the police pulled him up, they'd find nothing incriminating on him.

A week later Charlie Duncan called Arthur Southern of the Southern Jewelry Company to his home on a deserted island of Long Island. It was a dark night, and as the traveler approached the stationer, that preceded his home, Charlie kept up behind him and struck hard. Then Charlie quickly tilted the pocket of sport demands the pocket had been sleeping in his hold over. But just as Charlie made his getaway, the traveler opened his eyes, and Charlie knew that he had been seen.

Quickly he bent to look in his pocket, and up to the point where he kept the heaving piggybank had laid away from from Cleveland. The little paper was still lay loosely in some paper, and he hurried a diamond in each and cranked it in the papers' legs. When he was finished, he opened the bag in which he kept his piggybank, and out they flew. And as they winged all the road and out into darkness, he focused a light on each and through, Red pulled off that last big, rich haul!

The police searched fast and it was in the next days, as Charlie prepared to return for Cleveland, that they pulled him up. He presented no weapons, and a quick looking at the evidence brought nothing. Charlie didn't even feel a quiver of fear when the police started on taking him back to his place and searching it. But it was when they were in his room on the top floor that he felt his first surge of alarm, for directly above him on the roof, he heard the soft clacking of pigeon!

And it was then with upward glances of alarm that gave him away, for the police next looked to the roof in their search. And they caught all of Charlie Duncan's heaving piggybank, the diamonds laid in their lot!

Charlie's heaving piggybank having stolen from a fast-but-pull crook, because he had not learned his lesson thoroughly the heist where into consideration the fact that heaving piggybank will both both have their diamonds, if the wind is against them.

MURDER FOR PROFIT

A TRUE CRIME STORY

RUFUS McKEITH crept cautiously from the rear door of the Pasadena home, his head and hands toward the back. From a corner of the entrance, he slipped a glance up at the lighted windows in the house to make sure they were shut. He slipped carefully into his rear pocket and brought out a package of tobacco. He rolled some of it into a crude cigarette and placed it in his mouth. Twenty minutes later the light in the house went out.

Silently, he slipped through the rear door and shuffled in the darkness hallway until his fingers wrapped themselves around a heavy bathroom spring on the jacket shelf. After removing his shoes, he headed up the staircase, his hand gripping the balustrade in his back pocket. This was his last look at murder, but he was by no means an amateur. Ruth McKeele, who had picked poison for poison had carefully planned how to accomplish the simple liquidation of these people. Through one of the many big windows he could see his prey—a young couple peacefully sleeping. The instant hand came up as he walked silently to his smoking list. Now he was over the couple and leaning down at them. His next hand reached for him, the bathroom would light their death agonies.

The woman stirred the first blow, and her head rolled sideways, clashing the pillow with blood. The man, awakened by the disturbance, sat up dazed with sleep and near miss the bathroom came down. The murderer now headlessly moved through the door and ran down the hallway to a second bedroom. On a jolting bed, was a big, young man deep in sleep. McKeele placed the cushion against the man's temple and blew his breath out. His wife was done. But an professional would think of leaving the scene of his crime without performing the coup de grace. Returning to the first bedroom, he found his gun near gone, sending bullets through the temple of the young couple. There would be no hospitalized women or give him away!

The next morning, Sheriff James Wade on a deep thought in the living room of the Owens Mountain farmhouse. He recalled that the murders were apparently committed by a paleontologist who sought only to accomplish a deed of strength. The animal proved by the fact that nothing of importance was stolen. Two great cows and a broken down Ford truck had been taken from the garage. But a man dressed for such a small amount of loot. It didn't make sense. There were no prints in the house that would have made a "murder for profit" much more convincing.

The sheriff was determined to go to the bottom of things and by far his mind was over the death of the crime. The couple had been beaten hardly with a blunt instrument, while the third man had been shot through the head. Why? Could it be that the killer wished to work some sort of vengeance on the couple? If so, why murder the third man? Suddenly, the sheriff an up-ol' man! The murderer had evidently killed the couple first and once they were silenced, then the third man and then returned, to make sure of the couple's death.

The sheriff promptly required the further facts from the nearby lumbermen and soon learned Luke Baker, one of the nearest neighbors, knowing the boy for information, the lad informed him. He and Mrs. Ole had once lived a hard hand. He was a funny one. There was Rufus McKee's. There seemed to get along too well with people.

The sheriff thanked the boy for his help and contemplated on looking down the river. A general claim was not set to all such jobs to be on the lookout for a man attempting to kill two cows surviving in milk production quarters stamped on the side of the river. It wasn't long after that a milk company called back. A check for one hundred and fifty dollars had already been issued to a man answering the description of the suspected killer. It had been drawn on the Denver National Bank.

Shedl Wolfe and two officers went to the bank and learned that the check had not been cashed as yet. Waiting patiently for their quarry, Rufus McKee soon drove up to the bank and was allowed to cash the check. When he came out, he was watched to find he was surrounded by two officers and prepared to make a break. Shedl Wolfe, however, made a flying tackle and brought the man down!

After a quick confession, Rufus McKee was arrested in the Salway Street Prison where the warden, concerned in the odd crime, made a careful check of the killer's past. He found that McKee had started out on the wrong road at an early age. At fifteen, he had tried to cash forged checks and then advanced to horse stealing. That, and the compiling of other small crimes were the crime and so prison for some.

The warden called the murderer into his office and asked. Tell me, McKee, Why did you murder those three people? You had never done anything more serious than check forged checks?

"Those women?" asked the killer. "They were always picking on me. I resented the ones and then got out at the checks so that they couldn't prefer charges against me."

Were these brutal slayings committed out of sheer vengeance as was a far safeguarded proof? It had been significant in the past whether — for he was soon to learn that Coker must pay the Penalty!

These results are in line with the idea that the more people know about a particular issue, the more likely they are to support it. This is consistent with the idea that education and information are key factors in shaping public opinion.
